More than Ornaments A Metaphor for Culture
When Gold Blossoms: Indian Jewelry from the Susan L. Beningson Collection

(Hong Kong, September 25, 2012) On view from September 27, 2012 to January 6, 2013, at the Asia Society Gallery, When Gold Blossoms: Indian Jewelry from the Susan L. Beningson Collection offers visitors a glimpse into India's rich cultural history. The focus of the collection is jewellery from the south of India, in particular, jewellery for deities and women.

Curated by art historian Dr Molly Emma Aitken, the exhibition features more than 160 jewellery pieces from Beningson's personal collection. It includes exquisite bracelets, rings, earrings, necklaces and hair ornaments of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries.

A scholar of Chinese studies, Beningson began collecting Chinese textiles and Southeast Asian sculptures. She gradually broadened her interests to include artifacts from the whole of Asia. Beningson will be in Hong Kong to introduce to the Hong Kong public her collection and to share her passion for collecting.

This collection, as Beningson describes, "is based not on academic principle but on the pleasures of seeing, touching, and wearing." What is unique about this collection is that it also reveals what we cannot see, namely, the past lives of these objects.

In Indian culture, the components of jewellery possess otherworldly powers. Jewellery pieces are more than mere decorative objects and indicators of social status. They identify one's regional origin, religious affiliation, marital status, or even allegiance to a certain king.

This duality is evident on the pieces where the glossy enameled designs on the backs of the jewellery are even more stunning than those on the fronts. This is a secret shared only by the jeweller and the patron.

"The fascination of this Susan L. Beningson Collection lies not only in the delicate designs and luminous gems of the jewellery, but also in the experience of jewellery which is a deeply personal one," said Alice Mong, executive director of Asia Society Hong Kong Center. "Objects in this collection interact with the wearer. They are both shaped by, and shapers of experience."

Divided into two realms of experience, 'Women's jewellery', and 'Devotional Jewellery', the collection is brought to Asia for the first time by Asia Society Hong Kong Center.

The jewellery pieces on show are fashioned in a south Indian style, featuring distinctive forms and a preference for gold and rubies. This is remarkably different from jewellery of north India, which shows predominantly curvilinear shapes and is adorned mainly with precious and semi-precious stones.

Alongside the exhibition, Asia Society Hong Kong Center hosts a lecture series and leads children's gallery tours. A must-see for visitors of all ages, When Gold Blossoms presents a rich visual feast and offers a deeper understanding of the vibrant cultural and artistic traditions of India.

Visitors can view the exhibition and have a tour around the heritage site of Asia Society Hong Kong Center with a personal tour guide. This is made possible through a tri-lingual mobile app (English, Cantonese and Mandarin) custom-made by the Center.

The mobile app, which works on all 3G smartphones without the need of downloading and installation, enhances visitors' visual and learning experience.
