Yuriko Yamaguchi's Web-Like Sculptures to Transform Asia Society Texas Center's Grand Hall

Asia Society Texas Center is pleased to present a new exhibition of large-scale, mixed-media sculptures by Japanese artist Yuriko Yamaguchi. The self-titled exhibition opens to the public April 23, 2016.

“Yamaguchi’s works, with their organic presence and compelling dynamism, challenge us to connect with our environments in fresh ways,” says Bridget Bray, the Center’s Nancy C. Allen Curator and Director of Exhibitions.

The artist’s sculptures feature fragments of hand-cast resins, wire, and LED light, suspended in space and seemingly growing from the building. The artist’s web-like structures are not made by following a particular process; rather, each sculpture represents a series of adaptations and choices, growing naturally and spontaneously, much like a living organism does. Yamaguchi has previously explained that the purpose of her works is to “remind people that we are all connected in many overlapping webs woven out of the common forces that affect the human condition: family origin, economic stressors, religious beliefs, nature, time, place, and technology.” Through her works, she seeks to explore the constantly changing but ever-present hidden connections that bind the human experience to the natural world.

Her Cloud series in particular, speaks to the intersection of digital networks and art. “Once we get into the cloud, we become surrounded by humid air and find nothing,” says Yamaguchi. Both her art and the digital cloud are seen as “artificial” and “able to multiply endlessly.”

Yamaguchi’s abstract sculptures resonate uniquely in the spaces in which they are installed, and for her exhibition at Asia Society, she will create an original work for the Center’s Faye Sarofim Grand Hall called Weaving Time. “Architect Yoshio Taniguchi’s vision of the Faye Sarofim Grand Hall is the ideal ‘palette’ for Yamaguchi to use,” elaborates Bray. “Her spontaneous responses to architectural structures introduce a tension between the built environment and our lived
